ATLANTA, Georgia — If you're in the market for a last-mile distribution center, be prepared to embrace a mixed bag of site selection criteria. That's the central theme of an article authored by Russ Marzen, 3PD's executive vice president of warehousing and logistics, in the September issue of Global Corporate Xpansion.

According to Marzen, while some aspects of last-mile logistics site selection will be quite familiar to anyone close to the practice of logistics, many — including stem time and the increased need for a safe, aesthetically pleasing neighborhood — could come as a surprise to those who haven't paid much time or attention to the final component of their supply chain over the past ten years.

He added that, while "last mile seems to have gotten along well enough over the past 10 years without a lot of tweaking... paying more attention to it now has the potential to save your company big."
